

Interfaith work

At the Chris Worfolk Foundation we genuinely believe that one of the most damaging acts a religion can do is actually talk about what they believe. After all it's easy to see how silly the whole thing is when you suddenly find yourself watching a speech by the Pope or a Mormon on your doorstep.

As such we aim to increase the communication between believers and non-believers. We're best known in this area for our acclaimed Perspective course, which provides the religious a soap box for their beliefs and non-believers with a chance to ask any – and we do mean any – questions they want answers to. More information about the Perspective course can be found in our “guide for groups” booklets or online at www.perspectivecourse.org.

We have also been involved in a number of interfaith panels including co-hosting one with Leeds Atheist Society in November 2009 which saw representatives from many different faiths as well as a humanist representative field questions from a packed audience.
